Introduction to Card Indexes

Most record offices have a card index system, where the archivist can record individual records so that they can be found more easily. This section includes extracts from some of these card indexes.

In many instances, a code is given against the record. This code will refer to that particular record office's system and it will be necessary to quote it if you are making enquiries about further information.

These references are only a guide to lead the researcher to what must be much more interesting information. They will probably lead to original documents held at the record office that may or may not contain a wealth of information about individuals and perhaps their families and local history.

Who knows what is to be found from these records until they are consulted?

The address of each record office should be shown in section 8 of this book.

The Genbase Directory

The Genbase Directory was started by the author in the 1980s, using his newly acquired Amstrad PCW8512. It was quite advanced for its day, but new technology soon made it obsolete. He stopped entering data into it when a much more powerful PC computer was acquired.

There are some 2000 records on it, mainly baptisms and marriages, but other odd details. It is well worth a search, just in case that elusive ancestor is among its pages.
